COVER PHOTOS

I couldn't help noticing this Summertime sunset from Highway 136 on my way to Brownville one late afternoon in July.

The fireworks photo was taken at the end of Brownville's July 4th festivities.

I like to photograph wildlife and other scenes in nature. See pages 6, 7, and 9 for more of my photos, (Carol's are on 10 and 11.)

The Good ol' Days

Stephen Hassler

After college, in my first office job in the big city, the small talk my co-workers and I would exchange were topics of where we were born, where we went to school, and where we were 'brought up', among other things. I was then, and am now, proud of my rural upbringing on a farm. So at times I would relate the often difficult chores of feeding pigs, chickens, cows, calves, in cold Winters and in hot Summers.

I remember trying to chop through the Winter's ice in the cows' water-tank (we didn't have heated tanks), and trying to re-light the small kerosene lamps beneath the pigs' drinking trough. It was difficult striking a match while wearing two pairs of gloves (I wore my father's clothes over my own), and one time I noticed that I had allowed my glove to catch on fire.

It seemed as if every morning in January and February was 20 degrees below zero. But that was in northeast Nebraska, not the temperate southeastern part of the state where I live now. Back then my world was without running water or telephone, and with a one-room schoolhouse half a mile from home with outhouses and an outdoor well for pumping water, plus occasional water in the basement from the overflow of the nearby 'crick'.

My dad and I moved irrigation pipe from one row of corn to over 18 or more rows to a dry row for several additional hours of watering. We didn't have the large, mechanically-propelled, metal monsters seen in fields these days. Late in the season when the corn was tall, even taller than my junior high height, I had to push and balance the 20 foot aluminum, 4 inch pipe (with my finger-tips), over the corn tassels and 'catch' it in the next row. And the corn leaves almost cut my arms, leaving scratch marks when I didn't wear a long-sleeved shirt. Of course, the hotter it was, the more we had to irrigate, moving the pipe early in the morning and again late in the afternoon so that the water could run all day and all night.

But I enjoyed relating stories that sounded unbelievable; if the chickens didn't get enough calcium supplements (powdered oyster shells), we would occasionally find an egg without a shell, enclosed only by a delicate membrane. No one would believe there could be eggs without shells.

My favorite story was how you could hear the corn grow. No one believed that either. I wonder how many farm kids experience that today? Sometimes when a field close to the house was in corn, on a quiet night when the wind wasn't blowing, you could hear the 'click', 'click' of the corn stalks pushing upward, growing. The sound was like chewing on a stalk of celery. Maybe that story would be easier to believe if one knew that a corn plant can grow several inches in a day, and standing within a few hundred feet of thousands of plants, the multiple growth spurts sound like the wind bending the stalks... when there is no wind!

Real life experiences are often unbelievable. YouTube is full of them. (YouTube even has a video describing corn growing!) Someone ought to upload an audio. Anyway, there are many stories remembered of my growing up on a farm. And some of them would be hard for me to believe as well, if I hadn't lived them myself.

DEAD HEAT

Deep in the well of summer a breeze is only a memory, and the limp, humid heat beats down from a skillet hot sky. Sweat flows over skin in tickles of rivers, and breathing is like drowning.
The dark of night brings no relief, with the menacing hum of skeeters singing blood prayers to the moon.
Corn stalks unfurl at a furious pace, as their busy leaves whisper. A faint hope sizzles on the horizon, as flashes light up the inside of a thunderhead, and thunder rolls in mighty concussions of crashes. Like a midnight train, the storm passes, dropping brief torrents of rain blown sideways with gusts of cool air. But when the sun comes back in the morning, it is with a vicious fury of renewed oppression. The new moisture boils up, and we are trapped under the lid of a furiously boiling pot.

KOOLER

In the distant past of some people, summer was a time to be outside, to play in the dirt with miniature cars and trucks, to ride bikes to our friends' houses, to haul all of our treasures to the covered porch, or into the vast open space of the back yard. Tents made from sheets and blankets that hung from clotheslines were our own special places, and we filled them with the cherished dolls and stuffed animals that were living creatures to our untamed hearts.
We had crayons and coloring books and blank paper to make the world the way we wanted it to be, without edges or limits. Time was an abstract concept that had no restraints on our imaginings. We became the stars we saw on television and in the movies, writing our own scripts and acting out plots.
But we always knew that Mom wasn't far away, and that she would save us from thirst and hunger with homemade cookies served with outrageous colors of a packaged drink. The pitcher would sweat, as ice cubes floated in the sugary substance that seemed to have flavors that adults couldn't taste.
Life was KOOL, and shorter than we knew.

LINE OF LIFE

We all are part of a line that stretches far behind us and into the future.
It is unbreakable and no one is ever lost. We are links made from each other, and though death comes, we reassemble in cells that come after us.
And so it is that we continue to be alive.

PORK CHOPS AND POEMS

Shopping for groceries and ideas, placing items in the cart, check out and carry out, then home again in time to watch the evening deer and the bedtime wrens. Sleeping on the pillows and the thoughts, waiting for the sun, doing chores and listening to so many different songs that fly from tree to tree.
Getting hungry for the food and the words, and frying chops as key strokes sizzle. Then eating the pork on the plate and reading the rhymes on the paper, feeling full and satisfied.

FLUTTERS

At the edge of your eye is a nervous waver that steals your attention in a silent signal. It is a soft reminder that all wild things exist on their own terms, independent of opinions or judgements. They have a place to be and a purpose for being. Beauty isn't required, but often it is there, bringing colors and shapes that enhance our lives, if only we will notice. Butterflies know this just by being alive.

WREN TRIBE

They found the brush pile that evening, after tree trimmings were discarded. At dawn, it was undergoing inspection.
By noon, the pair had sat on every stick and branch, turning their inquisitive glances in all directions, memorizing angles of approach, landing and ascent, evaluating depth of cover and quality of camouflage, reporting to each other on this and that, until they decided to build a nest there, in that random detritus near a house, where humans would have the privilege to share their existence.

Diary of a Part-time Housewife

Merri Johnson

For three hours now I've been sitting in my screened porch keeping vigil over the wren house fifteen feet away. The wren parents have been frenetically catching and delivering moths and other delicacies to the little ones inside. This past week, we've been hearing the nestlings' faint cheeping from deep inside the house. Today it is noticeably louder, owing to the fact that the babies have moved to the "top bunk," as it were, and are perched atop the pile of nesting sticks just inside the opening.

Their tiny, pointy beaks pop out and in like the tip of a ballpoint pen. Occasionally one will poke its entire head out of the hole and look around with a few quick jerks before retreating inside to safety.

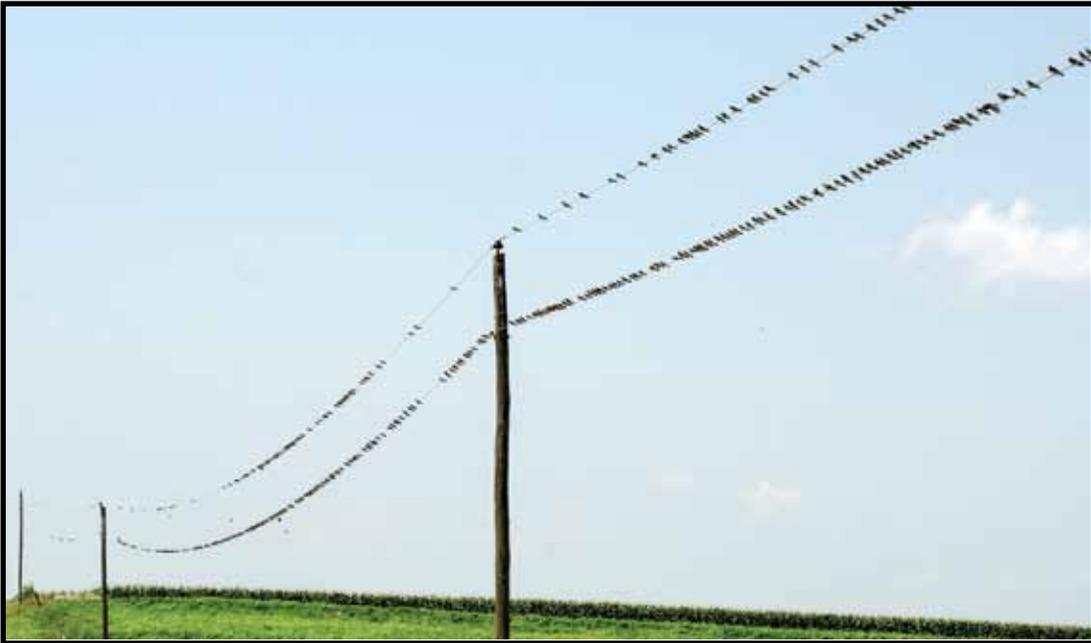

Meanwhile, the parents alternate between two exhausting extremes: attempting to coax their offspring to leave the house, and furiously warning them to stay put whenever a blue jay appears.

A few days ago, I witnessed first-hand the carnivorous behavior of a blue jay. It had nabbed a young house finch and was stabbing it with its beak in the grass just beneath the wren house. I intervened, but it was too late: the little finch was done for. As soon as I turned my back, the jay returned, plucked up its prey, and flew off with it, no doubt to feed its own young. Such is the reality of survival of the fittest. If one desires to observe wildlife, it is best not to be overly sentimental about the fate of individual critters.

As I write this, one adult wren is delivering a morsel to the young while the other is chattering insistently. A cardinal joins the alarm; it has a nest of its own nearby that I am also monitoring. The female is incubating four eggs in a nest in the Viburnum shrub, right at my eye level. Together, the cardinals and wrens have mounted numerous defensive maneuvers against the blue jays. It seems the rest of the birds are content to let the cardinals and wrens do all the work. (I guess birds and humans are alike in that respect.)

It's a great luxury to be able to sit here in my porch all afternoon, hoping to witness the young wrens' exit from their house. I paid my dues this morning, mowing for two hours, so I feel no guilt about indulging in a few hours of birding. As I've been sitting here, a young oriole has visited the plants on my patio seeking lunch, and a (luckier) little finch – still fluffy with downy feathers – has come to bathe and drink. It's 100 degrees by my thermometer. I can only imagine the temperature inside the wren house.

The heat has brought down a hush and stillness over the neighborhood, yet the wrens' dedication to their duty has not diminished. I wonder if they marvel at the miracle of their own existence. Most people would pooh-pooh the very suggestion. But in their way, perhaps these tiny dynamos of the bird world have some grasp of their part in the vast scheme of things.

Swallows migrating, late July, 2015.

Queen Anne's Lace is a common wildflower in July.

This year the Red Admiral butterfly is much more common than usual.

Open sky

I've visited wonderful cities from east to west north from Detroit and Chicago south from New Orleans to Miami with concrete and steel canyons blaring horns and sirens the never truly dark streets.

I've been to the mountains of the west watched sunrises kiss snow packed glaciers rafted on froth and frosty rivers stared in wonder at the deep canyons and red rock monoliths.

I've walked the northern pine forests along the root beer rivers heard the wind rustling in the treetops but something always brings me back here to the rolling hills of southeast Nebraska, southwest Iowa, northeast Kansas and northwest Missouri.

I need to feel the freedom of the open sky of a roostertail of dust on a gravel road or flying down a two-lane blacktop with fenceposts peppered with meadowlarks and red winged blackbirds between fields of emerald corn tawny wheat bending in the breeze alfalfa speckled with big round bales dark sunflower faces dancing in the sun.

Let me smell the wild plums blooming or feel the prairie wind against my skin; then throw a fistful of popcorn clouds across the bright cornflower bowl speckle it with red tail hawks and whirling turkey vultures for here beneath this wide open sky
I am once again
Home.

Hummingbird conversations

Around the feeder ruby throated hummingbirds swoop flit hover dance and fight and I wish I could hear their wingbeat conversations.
What would they tell me?

Do they discuss the weather the local nest situation compare the quality of spider silk swap migration route stories or point out their favorite flowers?
Do they have a pecking order who goes first and why?

Maybe they talk about politics or health insurance immigration or crop prices probably not though.
How would it feel to be in the tiny jeweled body buzzing around unable to be still always moving a heart beating six hundred times a minute.

If I could feel that I'd know what it feels like to fly across the Gulf of Mexico hover swoop dive and taste the nectar of a hundred thousand flowers.
